

Abstract

Argues Whitman's journey is a spiritual attempt at expanding the boundaries of self, particularly as illustrated in "Song of Myself" as it contrasts to "Song of Songs." Further contends Whitman's poetic experimentation is inherent with anxiety and a prescriptive dialectic.